The present invention relates to semiconductor device fabrication and more specifically to an electrical interconnect for a semiconductor device. In semiconductor device fabrication, the semiconductor wafer is processed in a number of steps before the semiconductor devices are separated and packaged. One process often used in the fabrication of semiconductor devices is photolithography. In this process, patterns are created in a photoresist mask layer which is then transferred to the surfaces of the layers on the semiconductor wafer using an etching or deposition process. After photolithography, however, it is often necessary to connect at least two separate circuits together. One type of device that is commonly used to join two separate circuits together is a so-called "via". A via is a conductive hole that is formed in one of the dielectric layers on a semiconductor wafer that extends through to the active circuit areas of the semiconductor wafer. The via is then filled with a conductive material, such as a metal, which serves to provide the conductive path between the circuits. Another type of device that is commonly used to join two separate circuits together is a so-called "capacitor". Capacitors are used to form "latch-up" circuitry within a semiconductor device. Capacitors have two conductive plates separated by a dielectric. Electrodes are connected to the conductive plates, so that a charge can be stored in the capacitor. Electrical components within semiconductor devices must be properly connected to form the desired electrical circuit. It is typically necessary to connect these components using interconnects that extend between the components. The conventional approach to forming these interconnects is to deposit a layer of conductive material that serves as a conductive path, followed by the deposition of a dielectric layer.
