To assess the effectiveness and tolerability of a subcutaneous infusion pump (SIP) in the treatment of intractable constipation. Thirty-eight patients treated with a SIP (one SIP per patient) for the management of intractable constipation were included in the study. A case note review was performed for all patients. The patients' age ranged from 2 to 55 years (median age 17 years). The SIP was programmed to deliver a specific dose of lubiprostone every day for 14 days at a fixed rate. The evaluation of the effectiveness and tolerability of the SIP was based on the scoring of the severity of the condition and the adverse effects of the SIP on the patients. Twenty-nine of the patients had experienced constipation for at least one year and 9 patients reported constipation for over 1 year. The SIP was well tolerated in 31 patients and 27 patients reported no significant adverse effects. Two patients developed a mild skin rash. In the majority of patients the SIP was effective. A SIP may be a useful treatment for intractable constipation. Noreen Rollin, from Modern Moments, on our wonderful trip to Nashville in 2016. What a fun time we had. Ernie and Noreen Rollin, 2016 Wednesday, June 14 Arlene has been a friend of mine since high school and is the primary reason I am able to make it to this party every year. She has a wonderful family and is a special friend. The Iowa kids Leanne and Kristen Thursday, June 15 This week, Kari and I headed to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, for a large family reunion.
