Upper gastrointestinal tract endoscopy and biopsy were performed in 46 patients with ulcerative colitis (mean age 47.9 years) and in 13 healthy control subjects (mean age 51.5 years). Intestinal biopsy specimens were examined by means of conventional histologic examination, the scanning and transmission electron microscope, and by histochemical and immunohistochemical methods. Fecal bile acid analysis was performed by gas-liquid chromatography. Control subjects had normal endoscopy and mucosal histology, were symptom-free, and had normal excretion of bile acids, as assessed by the total fecal bile acid content and the profile of fecal bile acids. Patients with active ulcerative colitis had characteristic endoscopic and histologic signs of inflammation and villous atrophy, and had a significantly higher total fecal bile acid output than the controls. Patients with inactive disease, however, had minimal or no endoscopic, histologic, or bile acid changes, and had a normal total fecal bile acid output. Patients in remission but with relapse had higher total fecal bile acid output than did patients in remission without relapse. In active disease the fecal bile acid profile was significantly different from that in patients in remission. The total bile acid output correlated significantly with histologic, endoscopic, and clinical features of the disease. These observations suggest that bile acid hypersecretion, and bile acid abnormality in intestinal mucosa and in the colonic lumen, are present in patients with active ulcerative colitis.
