I am trying to set a function call to every 15 minutes. I was thinking to use either window.setTimeout() or window.setInterval(). Is there a difference between the 2 or is it just a matter of style? A: The main difference is the callback and the repeat behaviour. SetTimeout/setInterval only callback when the function was called (then clearTimeout if setTimeout, clearInterval if setInterval). If you set up your timeout/interval to repeat every 15 minutes (15 * 60) it will be repeated every 15 minutes, but the callback will only be called once per 15 minutes. If you would instead use setInterval (if you would call the callback every 15 minutes) then the callback would be called every 15 minutes and it would start over if you call the function again. In general it is better to use setInterval, since you can then call clearInterval if you want. It is also important that you are using a timeout or interval function and not a setTimeout/setInterval function, since they will only call the callback once. A: There is no major difference in the way you would use them. Both can be used for repeating tasks, which can be useful. The main difference is the one you would use if you need to know when the task is done (like waiting for a form to be submitted and then redirecting back to the page). To do that, you use setTimeout for the first task, and the callback would need
