I have a service written using the Windows Service Provider Framework. This service (which is actually a DLL) is called by the ProcessExplorer.exe to get the NTFS Permissions for every mounted NTFS partition. This service has to be started and stopped only once a week. I tried to start the service using the following code: System.ServiceProcess.ServiceBase[] myServices = ServiceBase.GetServices(); if (!myServices.Contains(service)) { System.Diagnostics.Process.Start(service); service = ServiceBase.GetServices()[0]; } But in the service stopping event I'm getting an "NotSupportedException" and System.ServiceProcess.ServiceBase is set to null. I think the most probable cause for this is that the service is already running. I'm looking for a way to make sure that this service is started only once a week. Any Ideas? A: If you want to guarantee that it will be started once a week, you can't just check whether it is in the list of services. You'd have to rely on Windows events to do the job, e.g. by creating a scheduled task. You could use "schtasks" to easily create a new task that will run once a week. Of course, the task will have to run within Windows, but this is the only supported way to run scheduled tasks with a "one week delay". (Where a "one week delay" means that the task will be executed at a certain time, with a one-week delay. If the task runs at 18:10:14, it might run at 19:10:14 next week.) As suggested by the first comment, there is a rather simple method that allows you to use Sysinternals Process Explorer to find out whether a process is already running. If it is, you will not start it. This code is more or less directly copied from Mark Russinovich's blog. using System; using Icb139a0ed
