Acute changes in cerebral blood volume in response to perinatal hypoxia in piglets. Cerebral perfusion is decreased in newborn infants with perinatal asphyxia.

Because current non-invasive techniques to assess cerebral blood volume are indirect, it is of interest to study the acute changes in cerebral blood volume that occur in response to perinatal hypoxia in newborn piglets. Dynamic contrast-enhanced MRI was performed in anesthetized newborn piglets exposed to mild ( $\text{FiO}_2 = 0.12$ ) or severe ( $\text{FiO}_2 = 0.05$ ) hypoxemia for 1 h. The baseline mean signal intensity (SI) was measured in 30 ROIs in normoxic and hypoxic piglets and in adult pigs. The cerebral blood volume was calculated as  $(1-\text{SI})/(1+\text{SI})$ .

The SI of cortical and subcortical brain regions was higher during hypoxemia in the mild and severe hypoxic groups compared to normoxic control (all P Three-dimensional structure of the rhodopsin-receptor complex. Three-dimensional structure of the rhodopsin receptor has been determined by x-ray diffraction. The receptor is folded into the shape of a hemisphere with the surface formed by 11 transmembrane segments. Its cytoplasmic domain is composed of the long cytoplasmic helix connected to the transmembrane domain via a cytoplasmic loop. The receptor is not embedded in the membrane; the glycosylation sites lie
